

Academic Research in the 21st Century

Here starts
the lesson!

Academic Writing

- a formal style of writing used in universities and scholarly publications.

01

Specific and Clear Language

Specific and Clear Language

- should not sound pompous
- should not sound very formal

Scintillate,
scintillate, globule
aurific
Fair would I fathom
thy nature specific Loftily perched in
the ether capacious
Strongly resembling a gem carbonaceous.

(Rocco & Hatcher,
2011)

Specific and Clear Language

- should write in the register of academic writing

Avoid the ungrammatical or non-standard usages

Avoid language used in colloquial conversation and informal contexts

Avoid technical or specialized terms that are specific to a professional discourse community

Specific and Clear Language

- Characterized by bias-free language

A student, scholar, or academic should be careful to use words and phrases that do not discriminate against particular groups. whether in terms of race, gender, age, social class, or disability.

Informal/Non-Standard Usages

1. alright, alot
(non-standard, informal)
2. can't, won't, I'll, she's, didn't (conversational, speech-based contractions)

More Formal/Precise Equivalents

1. all right, a lot
(acceptable usages in Standard written English)
2. cannot, will not, I will, she is, did not (spelled out as two words)

Informal/Non-Standard Usages

3. ASAP, BTW, AWOL
(acronyms that may not be universally known)

4. UP, NCST (acronyms for institutions)

More Formal/Precise Equivalents

3. as soon as possible, by the way, absent without official leave (spelled out)

4. University of the Philippines, National College of Science and Technology (spelled out the first time they are used, but later may be substituted with acronyms)

Examples of Specialized terms

LAWYERS "legalese"

"bench trial" for a trial without a jury

reclusion perpetua for life imprisonment.

DOCTORS' medical terms and shortcuts

"CBC" for "complete blood count"

"stat" from the Latin statim, meaning immediately.

Activity

Revise the sentences using words that are formal.

Non-Academic Usage

1. The conclusion gotten by the group doesn't follow.

2. The student promised to submit the document asap.

3. She didn't do her homework.

4. A lot of people came to the store yesterday.

5. NCST is full of students with potential.

Academic Usage

1. The conclusion gotten by the group does not follow.

A Balance and Credible Voice

A balance and credible voice

- should not be stiff or stilled and somber in tone
- balanced objective and not overly emotional

Do not use emotive punctuation marks like “!”, “!!!” and “...”

A balance and credible voice

- In some disciplines, one has the choice of writing more formally either using the third person point of view (e.g., "This researcher believes that") or in what Professor Lynn Bloom calls the "Middle Level" of language.

This is "somewhat less personal" than the informal level, and while it allows the use of personal pronouns like I and you, "the author's personality and personal reactions are more subdued" (1995).

A balance and credible voice

- CLUTTERED WRITING

I found the Dulaang UP play Haring Lear (King Lear) to be not just entertaining but also insightful because I felt that the Tagalog translation effectively and humorously conveyed the spirit of Shakespeare's original dysfunctional family to a contemporary Filipino audience.

TIGHTER WRITING:

Socially and Culturally Relevant Topics

Socially and Culturally Relevant Topics

Considering topics that are interesting and relevant

Questions to consider when choosing a topic:

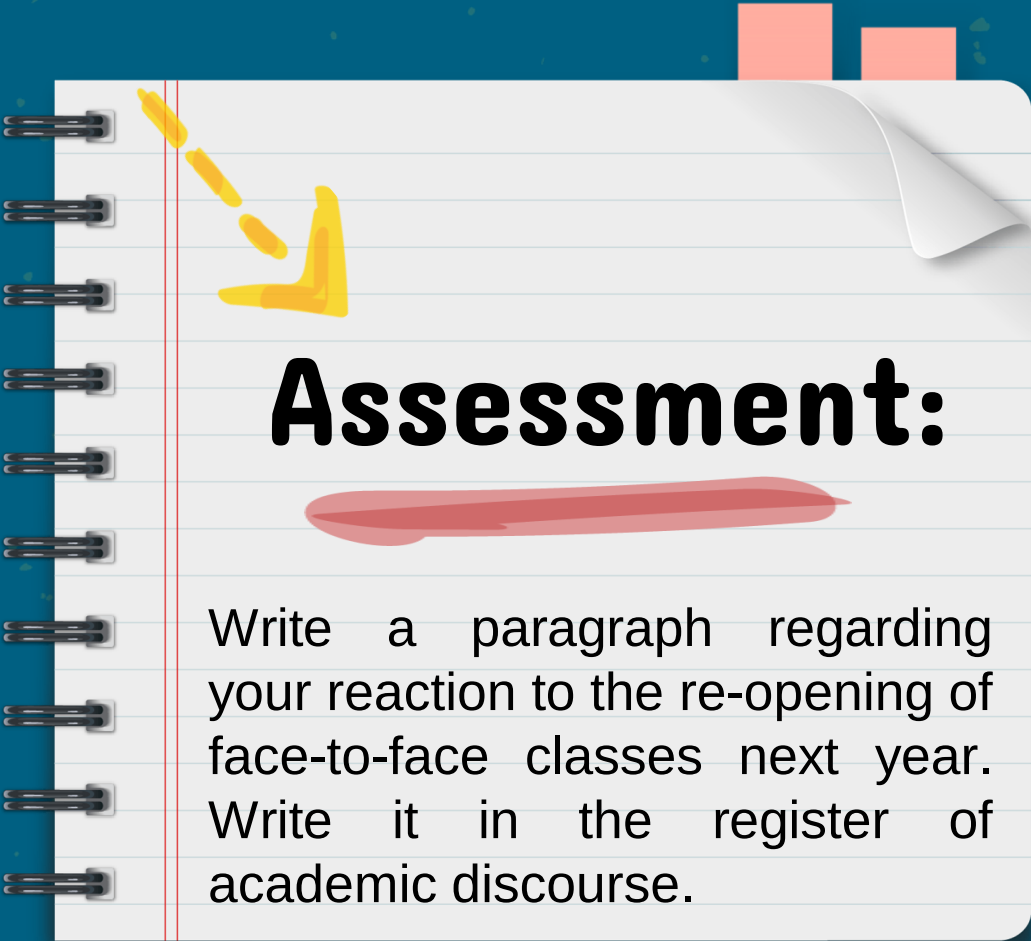

- Does their significance extend beyond the writer's personal stake in them?
- Do they matter to larger contexts like one's local community, the larger region, the nation, a group of countries, or the world?

Socially and Culturally Relevant Topics

Considering
topics that are interesting and
relevant

What students write
should be both
interesting and useful
to this larger
community, and it is the
writer's task to help
them to better understand the topic or
to see it in a new way.

Assessment:

Write a paragraph regarding your reaction to the re-opening of face-to-face classes next year. Write it in the register of academic discourse.

Thank you!
